Paytm: Telcos not doing enough on fraud calls

Payments Bank Files An FIR Against 3,500 Fradulant Nos.

RISING MENACE

Bengaluru: Paytm Payments Bank, which also houses the Paytm wallet, reeently filed an FIR against 3,500 fraudulent numbers. The payments company said telecom players are "not doing enough" to counter the rising menace of online fraud, where consumers are duped via SMS and calls.

Paytm Payments Bank MD & CEO Satish Gupta told TOI that while telcos have acknowledged the issue of rising fraud on online platforms, they are yet to take adequate action even when complaints are filed along with the involved numbers.

While other payments companies and online platforms are also facing the same issue, Paytm is the first firm to come out with an official statement.

"As a first step, the initial due diligence needs to be made more stringent so that telecom resources (bulk SMS and calling facility) are not provided by telcos to fraudsters. Further, if a complaint is filed against fraudulent messages/calls, the telecom service provider should be able to do due diligence on them and block such fraudsters immediately," said Gupta.

Cellular Operators Association of India (COAI), which represents telecom service providers, however, feels it is compliant with relevant Trai guidelines for commercial communications and has taken necessary actions.

"The complaint redressal mechanism is being duly followed by the telecom service providers and action is being taken according to the provisions of Trai regulations. The Trai complaint redressal mechanism allows individual telecom subscribers to make complaints to their service provider regarding any unsolicited commercial communication (voice and SMS)," said Rajan Mathews, DG, COAI.

This comes after the Noida-based company had also shared data of 3,500 numbers with Trai, the home affairs ministry and cybersecurity agency CERT-In.

According to sources aware of the matter, Trai officials recently held a meeting with lenders in Mumbai as many cyber crooks use their banking services to mislead people with promises of freebies and discounts.

A critical aspect of this matter is also what's called SMS shortcodes, often used by cyber crooks. SMS shortcodes are essential tools to use the company's name falsely to fool the consumers. For example, one of the most-used shortcodes is Pytm, mimicking Paytm. This can deceive a consumer to believe the text is coming officially from Paytm. Gupta added telcos need to have stringent control on the issuance of shortcodes for bulk messages to companies.

'Senior colleague takes credit for my hard work. What to do?'

Question: I am a woman employee who works hard behind the scenes, but my seniors are perhaps oblivious to my contribution. In our organisation, there is great emphasis on team work, but a senior male colleague, who has established himself well in the system, takes all the credit and does not talk about my efforts. The colleague gets to hang around with higher-ups due to his seniority. It's easy for him, I feel, because of male bonding. Being a woman, the going is tough for me. Please suggest how I can survive, if not thrive, in an environment where one keeps putting in hard work, without getting any appreciation for the same?

Ram

Saundarya Rajesh replies:

Let me assure you that the problem you are facing is actually gender-agnostic, experienced by men and women, young and old. When leaders are oblivious to changing workplace behaviour, it is a huge stumbling block to inclusion and belongingness.

Now, to your specific problem. First, a big hat-tip to you for the confidence with which you have audited your work. If you are convinced that you have really pulled out all the stops in delivering to the best of your effort, then that is the first step towards a very fulfilling, successful career. The satisfaction that you get when you love your work, are prepared to slog it out and present great outcomes is the bedrock of a long, impactful, rewarding profession. Remember, a series of jobs does not make a career. An intentional career is built, brick-by-brick out of occasions like the one that you describe, where you put your nose to the grind (albeit behind the scenes) and produce great output.

Let's now assess your case using the lens of culture. I see that the senior colleague is a tenured employee in the organisation, established and networked. But what I also gather from your letter is that, teamwork is an important people tenet of your workplace culture. Which would imply that a grievance that goes against the principle of teamwork and that is strongly evidenced, would be given its due. You mention about the hard work you have been delivering, and I am sure you have enough organisational data to substantiate your contribution.

As the first step, you may want to review all significant contributions that you have made over the last six months and have a brief and powerful presentation prepared about it. Assuming that the senior colleague is your teammate and you do not have a reporting relationship with him, please schedule a meeting with your manager at the earliest, to present your case. While you may want to explain to your manager the need for such a discussion, once you have your manager on board, my suggestion would be steer away from the allegations route and focus on what you have accomplished. Not only will this project you as an intentional and self-aware professional, it would help your manager to be more invested in your case.

On a slightly different route, I have a question for you. Has this "lack of appreciation" affected your performance appraisal? Has your boss overlooked you for increments, bonuses or incentives? No? Then, I would urge you to reflect on your career aspirations. Many women, whom we counsel and mentor, often confuse short-term glories with their long-term success. Receiving accolades is very nice. Name & fame are very tempting incentives. But even more important is your actual growth in terms of numbers. If during this same period, you got a promotion or even a significant increment, then do not stress the small stuff.

NAMRATA SINGH

If this has not happened and you have been denied both the soft & hard aspects of performance appraisal, then you may want to check with your HR on the grievance escalation matrix at your company to pursue this further. Your giving this your best and most strategic shot might set an example for other women colleagues as well and initiate important conversations on inclusion in the system. But if after following the proper channel, your voice remains unheard, I would suggest you look out for opportunities with employers that are known to be inclusive (such as the best companies for women in India).

You mention that it is easier for your male colleague to mingle with the seniors. The days of networking over chai & cigarettes where important decisions are discussed by the boys during smoke breaks is slowly becoming passé. More and more organisations (especially the ones that have unconscious bias training sessions & gender-sensitisation programmes) are realising that such gender-stereotypical ways of working do more harm than good to a company. I would urge you to find alternate channels and ways to connect with your seniors — does your organisation have an internal networking forum? Is there an ongoing mentoring programme? If yes, please avail of these forums to stay more intentionally networked. If not, use the opportunity to sensitise your management on the need for such forums, while you present your case.

A Correction

The report 'Irdai pulls up Oriental for hiding commissions', carried in the Feb 21 edition, said that the regulator had pulled up the insurer for hiding commissions. It also inadvertently mentioned that the company had agreed to restate accounts if required. The detailed order shows that Irdai had accepted the company's confirmation that payments were in line with outsourcing guidelines and had not pressed charges. The order also said that such payouts will be shown under "commission" in future financial statements. The error is regretted.

Hasura raised $9.9 million in series A

Chennai: Developer tooling products startup Hasura on Wednesday announced that it has raised $9.9 million in series A funding led by Singapore-based Vertex Ventures US. The round also saw participation from SAP.iO fund — an the early-stage venture arm of SAP, existing investors Nexus Venture Partners and Strive VC. Several angels also participated in the round.

With this funding, Hasura will invest in engineering and product development, in addition to hiring across sales and marketing.

"While we double down on the Postgres ecosystem (an open source database management system), these funds will help us bring the Hasura and GraphqL (a language for APIs) experience to other databases to mobilise data in organizations by making high-performance and secure data access a reality," said Tanmai Gopal, co-founder Hasura.

Speaking on the investment, Sandeep Bhadra, partner at Vertex Ventures US said, "We invested because of the incredible velocity of their product engineering, the community the founders built in such short order, and the pull from enterprises who want to empower their engineers." TNN

'Banks need to move ahead decisively on loan proposals'

The remarks came amid a credit slowdown, which bankers have attributed to overreach by agencies on alleged fraud. Nirmala Sitharaman once again sought to allay fears over this issue, saying the government will protect genuine business decisions and it had already put in place several measures to shield honest bankers. But she made it clear that banks need to move ahead decisively on loan proposals. She listed out several areas which required immediate attention to improve performance at the branch level. For instance, she said, there was over-reliance on data from credit rating agencies and credit information bureaus and branches no longer knew their customers well. "We have got credit rating agencies and agencies that rate different banking functions and therefore talk about the customer and his (credit) worthiness. But they are not advisory, they are only an indicator of what a customer is. Was there ever a directive from either the Reserve Bank or the IBA (Indian Banks' Association) to say that you will blindly follow the rating agencies numbers? No." Sitharaman suggested that there should be a "judicious mix" of personal connect with the customer and data. By ignoring that connect, she said: "Your goodwill is lost, your personal connect is lost, your assessment at the bottom level is lost… forgetting branch-level connect with customers has not done us good." The FM also underlined the need to motivate branch staff so that lending can get a boost and government schemes can be rolled out without any hitches. "The RBI will come back and say you borrow from me at a much lower interest rate, much lower than the repo rate... I can go on meeting you but it will still not reach the customer. Motivation at the branch level (is required)." The minister also said often branch-level staff was not even aware of government schemes, resulting in poor implementation. "General gyan on government schemes is not like before. You probably have people at branch level not even aware of those schemes that are being implemented in that branch in that particular area. Let's please do an introspection. It cannot be that the government wants to make sure there is inclusion, it cannot be that the government wants money to reach the poor but the instrumentality that is prevailing through which the money has to go just because of want of information is not able to move forward," she said, urging bankers to find a solution, while recognising that they may be facing a manpower crunch.
